Translation notes regarding various names in Omujo!

As you might have noticed, Omujo is a series full of various puns related to peeing and diapers. Did you also know that even the names are puns?

Oone Shouta/Shouko: "Onesho" is Japanese for "bedwetting". It may also be worth noting that while a different kanji is used in their names, "shou" can mean "small", and that "小さい方 (the small one)" is a Japanese euphemism for peeing, similar to "number one" in English.

Otohime Ichigo: As you probably know, "ichigo" means "strawberry". "Otohime" literally means "sound princess", but it is also the brand name of a certain Japanese invention commonly found in ladies' bathrooms, which plays artificial flushing sounds to mask the sounds of what's going on inside the bathroom. One of these is displayed on the first page of this chapter.

Nekomata Morei: As you might know, "neko" means "cat", and "nekomata" is a kind of Japanese two-tailed cat demon. Morei comes from "more", which is Japanese for "leak".

Nunota Muni: This is where things get more convoluted. "Nuno" means "cloth", as in cloth diapers. Muni is spelled with the kanji "無二", the second one meaning "two". In other words, "mu-two", or spelled in a more Japanese way, "mu-tsu". That's right, the "mutsu" from the Japanese word for diaper, "omutsu". Tl;dr: Her name basically means "cloth diaper".

Futaba Chika: This name takes the kanji word play even further. Futaba is spelled with the kanji 二葉, which literally mean "two leaves". An alternate reading of these two kanji is "ni-you", which can be shortened to "nyou", which is how the Japanese word for "urine" is pronounced. As for Chika, "chikai" means to be near/close. In Japanese, having a small bladder is often phrased as "nyou ga chikai (尿が近い)", literally meaning that the "urine is near (the urethra)".

Hanatsumi High School: "Hanatsumi" literally means "flower picking", an euphemism for using the bathroom, similar to the phrase "powdering your nose" commonly used in the west.

Arai: The class representative from chapter 4. His name comes from "tearai", meaning "washroom".
